

Making the move from...

Printed Payslips

We've come a long way from handwritten payslips on the back of a brown envelope, but despite technological advances, many businesses still deliver some, or even all, of their employees' payslips in a physical format.

Why companies print payslips

- Their payroll software does not have a portal or email option
- Their staff are not IT literate
- Their payslips can't be accessed by staff without access to work systems
- They are concerned about the security of online data

6 problems with this delivery method....

HIGH COST

The average cost of printing and posting a payslip can be anywhere up to £1.70 per payslip

TIME INTENSIVE

Printing, sealing and distributing physical payslips can take a significant amount of time

NOT SUSTAINABLE

Contradicts business targets to reduce carbon footprints or go paperless

INCONVENIENT

Employees today are used to receiving information online and accessing it where and when they want

INEFFICIENT

The demand on the payroll team to provide reprints can mean reduced productivity

NON-SECURE

Once a payslip has been posted it is difficult to track its safe delivery and storage

Despite the problems of printing payslips many businesses are reluctant to make the switch to digital.
